JUSTICE

Crime knows no borders. Neither does justice.

Whether it's an atrocity happening around the world or on U.S. soil, the key is learning how to become a force for positive change.

John Jay recognizes the importance and moral imperative of fighting all kinds of international crime including crimes against humanity, gender crimes, terrorism and organized crime.

A program fueled by faculty

At its heart, our MA program in International Crime and Justice features a faculty committed to developing future leaders in the field. With real-world experience working in agencies and with law enforcement officials, our professors do significant scholarship that effects better policy and meaningful change for those targeted by international crime. And just as global crime has no boundaries, neither does our course of study.

Students gain an integrated perspective from professors who are experts in a host of disciplines, from our Center on Terrorism to departments of Anthropology, Political Science, Sociology, Criminal Justice, Law, Economics, Psychology, History, Police Science and Criminal Justice Administration.

Scanning our faculty's areas of expertise reveals a breadth of experience and insight into the complexities of global crime. We work in such areas as religion, deviance and crime, crime prevention, international relations and human rights, organized crime, gender/family issues and crime, race relations, political violence, genocide, international tribunals, terrorism, comparative policing and counter-terrorism, wildlife crime and environmental criminology, international security, public policy, women in policing and drug abuse. Our geographic focus also ranges far and wide, from Latin America to Europe, from the Middle East to Asia.

Research and analysis opportunities for students

Agencies are looking for the next generation of analysts whom we train in the International Crime and Justice MA

Building on the foundation of our undergraduate major in International Crime and Justice (ICJ) and co-sponsored conferences on global social justice and human rights in major European cities, we offer an interdisciplinary Master of Arts program in International Crime and Justice.

It's graduate-level education for those who want to go further with international criminal justice research, delve deeper into cutting-edge analytic techniques and ultimately become a producer of substantive knowledge about global crime challenges.

program. We put solid coursework at the program's core including International Crime and Justice Theory, International Economics, Comparative Criminal Justice Systems, International Law and World Order, Culture and Identity in a Global Context, Research Methods in International Crime and Justice and Using Computers in Social Research.

Students then choose from electives to learn state-of-the-art techniques in courses like Homeland Security and International Relations, Terrorism and Human Rights and Human Trafficking.

Experience is also gained through hands-on work with faculty research. Among recent opportunities for students: co-authoring an article on violence against migrant workers and their families with Program Director and Prof. Rosemary Barberet; researching the black market for cigarettes with Prof. Klaus von Lampe; studying drug traffickers' wiretapped conversations with Prof. Mangai Natarajan.

Working alongside faculty provides students with opportunities to practice skills taught in the classroom and put theory into practice. Students then take that training into fieldwork, an extra edge well-suited for positions at agencies such as the DEA, FBI, CIA and Homeland Security, as well as at organizations like the World Bank, the United Nations and Interpol.

Students come from all over the world to study at John Jay College. Mid-career police from as far away as Ireland, Turkey, and Ukraine come to John Jay's Manhattan campus to learn in our classrooms. At the same time, faculty travel to instruct police abroad, such as teaching the Police Staff College, Bramshill in England, where police from Scotland Yard do their training.

To further broaden students' horizons, we strongly encourage study abroad options while pursuing this Master's Degree. Students may consider study abroad programs in the summer and winter.

What an MA in International Crime and Justice means to you and the world

International crime is pervasive, and the need for John Jay graduates with an MA in International Crime and Justice has never been greater.

We look for applicants who desire a truly global outlook on criminal justice; who have a heartfelt commitment to making things right in the world; who want to focus on professional competence in an increasingly multicultural workforce.

Our students embrace this program as a vehicle for exploring all of the possibilities in International Crime and Justice ultimately synthesizing theory from an array of disciplines. Students gain the needed skills that agencies and organizations seek for effecting change, curtailing crime and easing suffering of victims.

We invite you to apply to this dynamic MA program in International Crime and Justice, encompassing an evolving field of study that addresses the changing nature of crime in the 21st century for international human rights and justice.
